

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I would like to thank the Aspen Institute Nonprofit Sector Research Fund (NSRF) for supporting this exploratory work, which was fascinating to conduct and, I hope, true to the mission of the NSRF. David Williams was always helpful and patient.

I am grateful to the staff at the Center for Urban Policy Research (CUPR) for helping me to put together a winning proposal and for freeing me to spend as much time as possible on research and writing and as little as necessary on administrative issues. Thanks to Norm Glickman for endless support, to Bill Marosy for assisting me with my budget, and to Mary Jane Hicks for keeping track of all of the details one easily lets slip when working on a year-long project. Cathy Liapes proved an excellent editor and Shannon Darroch did a fabulous job of putting the whole report together.

The good people at the Community Technology Centers Network (CTCNet) were extremely helpful. They helped to orient us to the field, asked us good questions about our research and, perhaps most importantly, shared their membership list with us so that we could conduct our survey. In particular, we thank Clifton Chow, Holly Carter, and Steve Ronan.

Marla Nelson deserves extra-special thanks for her tireless work as a research assistant throughout the entire project. Marla worked on every aspect of this project, from weeding through policy text to drafting the survey to interviewing people in the field to writing important sections of the report. This project owes an enormous debt to her insight and persistence. At various stages, Phil Ashton and Peggy Jen also provided excellent research assistance. Diana Downton, Marion Trail, Deborah Spayd, and Eric Shaw helped to transcribe interview tapes and enter survey data. Abeni Crooms toiled to raise our survey response rate by phoning and faxing non-respondents.

I am especially thankful to the community technology activists, organizers, policy makers, and program participants who shared their experiences, challenges, and hopes with us. These people opened their homes and offices to us and told us everything they know about this field. Without their cooperation and assistance, this project could not have succeeded. I hope that this report will further the work that they are doing by raising public consciousness about the digital divide.
